

The improved news, traffic and music services that are now being made available through satellite-based systems such as XM and Sirius are a tremendous leap forward for the average consumer like me.

I now understand that some organizations are now working to limit what can be sent via this new media source. I am rather upset that important advances in technology such as XM provided radio are being attacked by traditional news/traffic services who are being threatened by new technology. Stifling news/traffic over services like XM or Sirius radio is a net loss to the average American consumer. We should embrace not fear advances in modern technology.

- Robert Huddleston